SUBJECT: In-tank Fuel Filters (informational bulletin)

2011-01-PB-AL

In modern vehicles, fuel pumped to an engine has been routed through a fuel filter located on a frame rail or inside an engine bay before being allowed into the fuel delivery system (carburetor, throttle body, fuel rail/injectors, etc). However, an increasing number of newer vehicles do not have a fuel filter on the frame rail or in the engine bay; the line exiting the tank runs directly to the fuel rail. Located inside the fuel tank, the pump and filter have been incorporated into a module or assembly, with the filter usually residing just above the fuel pump. This allows them to be made larger and with more filtration media to increase capacity.

In-tank filters should be replaced just like standard in-line filters even though some manufacturers have no recommended replacement schedule for them. There are circumstances such as high mileage, bad/incorrect fuel, or during a fuel pump replacement where the installation of a new in-tank filter is necessary or otherwise advantageous. Beck/Arnley currently has a growing product line covering many popular applications and will be announcing more in-tank fuel filters in the near future.
